The Daily Quote

"It's just mid-November, but it's quickly becoming a reality: Washington could be mostly done making laws for the year. If it isn't evident by looking at the thin congressional calendar, top sources in both chambers are downright grim that the final eight weeks in 2013 will produce any legislative breakthroughs, like a broad budget agreement or an immigration deal... It would be a fitting end to 2013, a year devoid of the landmark legislation that both parties say the nation needs. Both privately and publicly, top D.C. leaders are voicing skepticism about anything happening this year. In a recent meeting with his Republican leadership colleagues, Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) joked that the House shouldn't even remain in session in December. As the schedule stands now, the House anticipates being in session eight days next month, after working seven days in November."
