The Daily Quote

"The House is holding lots of headline-grabbing oversight hearings – 100 in May alone. But when it comes to the actual crafting and advancing of legislation, the lower chamber is on pace for one of the least productive sessions in recent decades. The 21 permanent committees in the Republican-led House have issued just 94 original reports or markups in the first five months of the year, the second-lowest showing in any opening of a Congress since at least 1997, records show. Production at the start of a new session was only ever lower once – in 2001, when just 80 House committee reports were issued through May... Through May, there have been just 11 public bills that have become law (two others have not yet been signed), the lowest number for the first five months of a session since at least 1995, according to numbers available from the Library of Congress and the U.S. Government Printing Office."
